No. 1 Please look at the fourth picture. If you were the man, what would you be thinking?

No. 2 Do you think that the behavior of adults in public places sets a good example for children?

No. 3 Should companies have to provide child-care facilities for their employees?

No. 4 Can sports help bring different nations closer together?

One day, a man was talking with a co-worker in the office at the pool where he worked. He was showing her a graph that said the number of teenage visitors had been steadily decreasing, and he said that they needed to do something to attract more of them. At a staff meeting, the man was proposing two ideas for attracting teenagers. One of the ideas was to build a new attraction, and the other was to increase the pool's advertising budget. The man's staff agreed that adding a new attraction was a better idea. The following year, a waterslide had been built, and many people had to come to try it. The man was please to see that everyone was enjoying the waterslide. A few weeks later, a woman had come to speak to the man in his office. She told him that her young daughter had been knocked down by an older boy.

No. 1 I'd be thinking that we needed to have stricter rules. It's great that the waterslide has been effective in increasing teenage customers, but we need to ensure that
