One evening, a young businessman was working in his office. While there, he received a phone call from his father. The father asked his son if he could come over and help out on the family farm that weekend. The young man thought it was a good idea. On the weekend, the young man went to his parents farm and helped them with the apple harvest. He stood on a ladder picking apples that were difficult to reach. He seemed to enjoy the work, and his parents were really grateful to have him around. That evening, however, while the family was having dinner together, the young man's mother told him that they were getting too old to keep running the farm. On his way home, the young man thought about what his mother had said. He wondered whether he should continue working at his office or consider taking over the family farm.
