One day, the mayor visited the construction site of the new basketball arena. He wanted to check how things were progressing. A site worker told the mayor that they were right on schedule. Six months later, the mayor was seated in the newly built arena watching a game at the basketball tournament. The arena was full of fans, so the mayor looked very pleased. However, a year later, things were different. On the wall of the mayor's office was a schedule of events for august, but only one event was planned. The mayor pointed to the schedule and asked his assistant if that was the only upcoming event. She looked disappointed and nodded. At the next staff meeting, the mayor made some suggestions on how to make better use of the arena. He suggested it could be used for weddings, flea markets, or dance lessons. The mayor then asked everyone what they thought of his
