been given free rein to do so in the name of economic development. That must stop, and lawbreakers must be severely punished.

- 5. Secondly, meeting demand requires a change in the mindset of consumers, especially those in developed nations, who often take water for granted. They leave taps running, and use too much water when bathing. Only a greater awareness of the need for conservation can help make them change their ways.*
- 6. Finally, infrastructure needs attention. In developed countries, this may simply mean maintenance of the current water networks. In developing nations, however, it may mean the wholesale development of efficient agricultural irrigation systems and desalination plants to supply the needs of growing populations.*
- 7. Some people believe water will be the cause of major conflict in the future. Meeting future water demand is something we must deal with if we are to prevent such a catastrophe.*
